Animal Shelter Live Outcomes at 90 Percent

Without much public fanfare, the Georgetown Animal Shelter passed an important animal welfare milestone last year. In 2011, the shelter had a live outcome rate of 90 percent. That means that nine out of ten animals that came to the shelter were adopted to new homes, transferred to rescue groups, or returned to their owner.

“This is a big accomplishment for an open intake municipal animal shelter since we do not get to pick and choose what animals come through our doors,” says Jackie Carey, animal services manager. Carey says that despite some common misconceptions, the Georgetown Animal Shelter follows a practice that has broad public support. “We don’t euthanize any animals that we consider adoptable,” says Carey. She adds that animals were not euthanized due to lack of space at the shelter.

Some animals that were not adoptable due to medical conditions or severe behavioral problems like biting were euthanized. However, some stray cats that were brought to the shelter and typically would have been euthanized in the past, since they were semi-feral, were adopted by ranchers and farmers in an innovative barn cat adoption program.

Comparing live outcome rates for animals among municipal public shelters, nonprofit shelters, and rescue facilities can be difficult due to varying rules for intake, adoptions, or shelter management. In January, the City of Austin animal shelter announced a live outcome rate of 91 percent for 2011. Based on a benchmark of a 90 percent live outcome rate used by some shelters, Austin reported that they were a “no-kill” shelter for 2011.

At the Georgetown shelter in 2011, the live outcome rate was above 90 percent in five separate months. While Carey has not analyzed the figures for other shelters, she says the 90 percent live outcome rate for the Georgetown shelter is a fair measurement since it includes animals assessed to be not adoptable. “Our numbers are true numbers of all animals that come in, including the animals we euthanized that were not adoptable, but are still counted,” says Carey.

Behind the higher live outcome rate for 2011 is a multifaceted effort developed by the shelter over many years. That effort includes an active adoption program through marketing and outreach events, frequent spay or neuter clinics, an active foster care network, and community education. Cooperation with rescue groups, PetSmart store adoption programs, and other shelters in the area also has played an important role. Supporting the shelter in all its efforts are dozens of volunteers who take animals to adoption events, walk dogs, clean cages, foster animals, coordinate fundraising events, and much more.

“The live outcome rate we achieved last year was due to the work of so many people, including the Animal Shelter Advisory Board, our dedicated volunteers, our hard-working shelter employees, and the broader community,” says Carey. “The result of all this effort is that so many more dogs and cats are healthy and living in good homes in our community.”

Spay or Neuter Clinics for Cats

The City of Georgetown Animal Shelter will offer free spay or neuter clinics for free-roaming cats in Georgetown on March 3, April 7, and May 5. The goal of the clinics is to reduce the free-roaming cat population.

Spay and neuter surgeries and rabies vaccination will be provided at no charge. Appointments are required for the free clinics, which are offered on a first-come, first-served basis and are not necessarily for low-income cat owners. Cats or kittens must be at least three months old. Since the clinic is offered to free-roaming cats whose owners who live in the City Limits, bring a utility bill or other proof of residency.

Call (512) 930-3592 to schedule your cat for surgery. All spay or neuter surgeries will be done by a licensed veterinarian. Appointments are limited to 60 cats. The spay and neuter clinic will be held at the Georgetown Animal Shelter, 110 W.L. Walden Drive.
